Item A

Sociologists disagree about the nature and extent of religious belief and practice in societies today. One difficulty in assessing religiosity is the unreliability of statistics. There are no turnstiles in churches to measure attendance, and occasional head counts of worshippers can be misleading. Similarly, surveys on belief lack validity as people do not always tell the truth.

Sociologists such as Davie argue that the nature of religious membership and practice has changed and that belief has become a more private affair. Other sociologists argue that some groups – for example, the young – find traditional churches and religions unattractive, and now search elsewhere for meaning and for the fulfilment of their spiritual needs.

Item B

Modernisation theorists such as Rostow assume that a similar path to development will be followed by all societies. This path will lead to the replacement of traditional values by the adoption of modern industrial values. This assumption sees development through industrialisation as something that all societies should want and should strive for.

However, not all sociologists agree with this view of development. Some argue that, although a western-style model of industrialisation may bring some benefits, such as a rise in employment or gross domestic product, it may also bring many problems. For example, the move towards an industrial society may threaten many aspects of the traditional way of life.

Item C

Sociologists have been concerned about the ways in which certain groups are represented by the mass media. For example, some argue that young males are often stereotyped as delinquent or engaging in various forms of anti-social behaviour. Similarly, Newman (2006) argues that when there is a focus on the working class in the press or on television, the report is usually unflattering or presents them as a problem, for example as 'chavs' or as welfare cheats.

However, some sociologists argue that such stereotyping is less of a concern today. They argue that the media now present a balanced picture and provide a true representation of reality.

Item D

Classical elite theorists Mosca and Pareto differ in their analyses of society. However, both conclude that societies are run by elite groups. These elites hold the powerful positions in society and make all the key decisions. This means that the majority of the population have very little power, and very little say in how society is run.

However, not all sociologists agree with this view. Some argue that in society today there are checks and balances in the system to prevent such elite dominance. As a result, everyone has access to power. Others argue that elites still exist, but that the nature of those elites has changed.
