Unit A582 Workshop Presentations Marking Criteria (AO1& AO2)

All three presentation items are marked using this criteria. Rehearsed improvisation should be marked out of 20 the other two items are assessed in combination and marked out of 20.

Drama in the making - Unit 2 - Working Record

Intention:

We wanted to educate our audience on the effects of the Vietnam war, and a war in General. We wanted to provide an unbiased representation of ~~with~~ some of the things that happened in the war so that our audience ~~were~~ ^{would be} able to absorb the facts and then form their own opinion. We also wanted them to really think about the consequences of war and the supposed 'reasons' behind it.

Genre:

Our genre is theatre in Education. We chose this genre over a docu-drama because we thought that our priority was to educate children of 12+ in schools. We didn't want it to be aimed at adults, who we thought would have already formed opinions, but at a younger audience, on whom our drama could have more of an impact, and be a lot more educational. Because we chose theatre in Education, we tried to keep our drama very fact based and very unbiased. We also tried to use powerful, but not grotesque or disturbing images; suitable for the age group we want to address.

Performance Style:

We chose Brecht as our performance style. We used non-naturalistic methods such as chanting and tried to keep our tone ~~period~~. We are trying to have all the actors onstage all the way through as well as using a much more

* Also, it is the children of our society who will one day be in positions to cause or to stop a war and so we thought it was important that they knew all the facts.

Sophisticated analysis of genre & concepts for use non-naturalistic conventions such as chanting.

Our goal is that, although the civilians are the most affected, they are almost always the most affected.

Ideas so far:

So far we have ~~the~~ devised 3 parts of our drama. We have started with a non-naturalist set-up of an LBJ speech in which the crowd ~~gather~~ converge around him, their chanting become louder + louder until you can no longer see or hear him. We then move onto a second piece of drama, which is more naturalistic. In this part we depict soldiers invading a Vietnamese village, killing # a family they find there and then burning the ruin. We hope that this bit of drama will be very powerful and will shock our audience. In our third section, we all step forward to read a different fact about the Vietnam war + the devastation it caused. We chose to do this because we wanted to break up the naturalistic piece of drama, as well as declaring the scale of the devastation at what we hope, will be the most emotional moment. After this, we intend to move onto a scene that shows the Americans loss due to the war, in order to avoid bias. For this part we think we may depict an American family whose son has gone to fight in Vietnam. We might then show his struggle in the camp and the war and then finally, go back to his family and show them opening the letter announcing his death. We hope that this will shock our audience, as well as teaching them that there are two sides to every story.

Character involved in the drama

In our drama we had 6 characters in the beginning. A mother, teenage daughter and a young son of a Vietnamese family and 3 soldiers - A general, a major and a new recruit.

Character you have devised

In the drama I was the mother in the Vietnamese family. I've had a very hard life, sowing the land, and I am ~~strong~~ fierce and fierce but also very fair and ~~non-judg~~ loyal. I'm not uncaring but I know my responsibilities and have a serious outlook on life. My husband died some time ago and my kids are all I have left.

I'm a non-active supporter of communism as I believe the values but do not want to get too involved and have to compromise the safety of my family. I'm not stupid. I know the risk. I am highly religious and ~~devoted~~ to fair morals. I am respected in the village for my honesty, loyalty and knowledge.

One day I hope to see my village free from the threat of famine and war.

I wanted my character to ~~display~~ power and strength but at the same time as displaying her fierce love and loyalty to her family and so I centred her life around these key parts.

I wanted the audience to be proud of my character and her protection of her children, as well as respecting her.

I wanted my character to fit into village life and the main religion in Vietnam and so I researched buddhist teachings as well as village life to help create the world of my character.

Scene by scene analysis:

We start our drama with a speech from LBJ, the President of USA during the largest part of the Vietnam war. As the speech is read out, we create a non-naturalistic representation of protesters chanting "Hey, hey, LBJ, how many kids did you kill today?". While doing this we surround LBJ and drown out his words by shouting our affirmations over him. Our heads then all dropped and we froze on stage. I think that this was a very effective piece of Brechtian drama and it helped to portray to our audience, not only the general opinion of the american people at the time, but how politicians tried to justify the war and the kind of techniques they used to get people on side. Hopefully, this small piece of drama would show our audience the "reasons" for the war, as well as the protestation against it.

Coming out of our freeze, we then set the stage for the 2nd piece of drama. This piece was a lot more naturalistic and involved set characters. It involved soldiers marching off-stage, making offstage noises, and then coming onstage centre stage right as the Vietnamese family run to centre stage left, and hide behind some staging. Throughout this little piece, the vietnamese family stay close to the ground as the soldiers stand

Straight, ~~stares~~ standing tall over them and showing strength through their proxemics and power over the Vietnamese. The family are then discovered by the soldiers and their stage coverage is thrown off stage. The noise this makes it very dramatic and shocking. The soldiers then shout at the family as they huddle downstage left for protection. This bit is very naturalistic to convey the power of the moment. The Vietnamese family are then, again, pushed low to the ground showing their vulnerability - and the Major starts interrogating the young boy, right in front of the audience, Downstage centre. While this is happening, the mother and teenage daughter of the family begin to whisper frantically and are forcefully told to shut up by a soldier.

Following this, we used slow motion. We had the mother running ~~forward out~~ to the right of the stage and trying to wrestle the gun off of the Major. This creates a very powerful image as, in slow motion, you see the mother losing her grip and being overcome by the Major. We used slow motion here to really draw attention to the moment and to show ~~that~~ how, in seconds, a life can be taken away. We hoped that our audience would notice this message and really reflect on the moral implications of war and the death it caused. After this, the action speeded up again and the Sergeant shot the teenage daughter. This has a tremendous impact on the audience and we hoped to shock them and really get them attention. In the next few seconds, the new recruit was forced by the Major to shoot the little boy. The scene then freezes with the Vietnamese laying dead downstage and the soldiers standing around them. We froze here to give the audience time to really absorb what they'd seen and to fully comprehend the destruction left by the soldiers.

After this, we formed a line through centre stage and read facts about the Vietnam war, - how many people died etc. This we put this here because we wanted to make these facts as powerful as possible and to really shock our audience.

The last scene was very abstract and non-naturalistic. We used conventions such as mime and letter reading and players played close attention to proxemics. We tried to use different levels in our abstract piece to keep our audiences' attention as we created a circle on stage. We moved around the circle, imitating a soldier moving through a jungle terrain until one of us stepped out and addressed the audience. As they told their story of how they felt about the war through letters home, in our circle we mimed the most powerful parts of what they were saying - for instance when a soldier said 'I shot a little boy today!', we all turned into the circle and shot at each other. We did this to try and catch the full audience's attention and get them to realise the full weight of what the speaker was saying through both verbal and visual aids.

Question + Answer Session:

I think our question and answer ~~question~~ session went quite well as I think we used lots of terminology, we had good structure to our answers and we all had something to say. I think it could've been improved by having more discussion and chipping in to each others answers more often.

I answered the question 'In an ideal world, how do you see your drama developing in the future?'

Evaluation:

I think that our performance went to plan. I thought that it was good for the time we had to prepare and that we managed to get our gthesis across to the audience. However, I think my Semantics could've been much stronger and that I could've used more eye contact to show my relationship between different characters. Also, as a group, I think we could've devised a drama that could make individual characters shine through and so, given more time, I think we could devise another ~~act~~, more naturalistic piece of drama on how the soldiers actually ended up in Vietnam. We could use a split stage to show the audience each of their different paths and this would ~~allow~~ the add depth to our drama and, hopefully, make our drama that ~~will~~ much more powerful.

I also think that sound effects such as gun shots and jungle sounds (bird calls and leaf rustling) would improve our drama, not only by helping us, as actors, to slip into our roles and our setting, but by making the audience feel as if they are really in the set with the characters as well. Lighting would also be useful. For instance we could spotlight the actor playing LB in the first scene and then black out ~~as the shouts~~ the stage as our shouts reach full volume. We could also use a fire gobo to represent the torching of the village. ~~and a b along as~~ I think that this would help our audience become much more interested in our drama and it would hold their attention more effectively.

I reviewed another group in the class and thought that their drama was amazing. It held my attention all the way through and it looked like they had done a lot of research on what being in the army was like and how new recruits were treated. Their genre was documentary ~~but I think it may have~~ and I think that this suited their drama well, as it was based heavily on facts and actual experiences that they had researched. I thought there was a part of their drama at which they stepped forward and each stated their 'name rank and status' and I thought that this was really powerful, especially when the Sergeant Major turned her head away from the new recruit. I think it really demonstrated how hated new recruits were and how badly they were treated. I would recommend, however, that the scenes could be tweaked slightly to make them flow better because at times I was a bit confused over which character was which and whether the roles remained the same or not. I was also a bit confused by the order of the scenes as to who it was that was meant to have died.

This is a stunning working record of Item 1 which is amazingly detailed given the time restriction you were under. Your detail of character + the choices you made are very coherent showing sophisticated understanding of the social, historical + cultural elements of your piece:

Your analysis of genre + style shows clear, in depth, understanding for the elements involved plus the impact your choices make on an audience.

One of the best evaluations of a piece of devised drama I have ever read. Very well done.

Drama in the making

Item 2

Monologue.

I decided to do a monologue because I wanted to challenge myself and do a piece of drama without other actors for support. I chose my character to be the mother of one of the soldiers in our original piece of drama because I wanted to develop the idea of how war effects everybody in some way or another. I wanted to show, also, that the Americans weren't just the bad guys and that those behind the 'front lines' were also suffering. I also tried to integrate our main goals into my monologue by making my character an average civilian. Someone who had nothing to do with the war but who was still suffering because of it.

My character was a middle aged woman of around 45. Her brother had died in WWII and her son was off fighting in Vietnam. She is of working class and has two jobs: a cleaner and a typist. She dresses practically and wears little makeup - just a touch of mascara and occasionally a subtle pink lipstick. She is of the Christian faith and wears a cross around her neck which she often fingers when nervous. Her faith keeps her strong through many trials and she attends mass every sunday - it helps her to think and release tension.

The first thing I did when writing my monologue was establish a setting. I first thought I would do it in a church but then later decided that it may be more powerful if I went to visit my brothers grave.

Shows development

Detail of

Thoughtful + planned

Having decided this I decided to use a bouquet of flowers as a prop - both to show where I was and to demonstrate that I had a close relationship with the person I was visiting. When choosing the flowers, I chose modest ones as I thought my character may not be able to afford extravagant ones and also I wanted the flowers to just ~~repr~~ be practical and not in the way. After this, I ~~designed the~~ wrote my script, trying to keep my writing style informal and personal. I tried to write it as I would naturally say it - adding pauses, stutters and unfinished sentences. I also tried to add ^{stage directions} ~~semiotics~~ to make my character come to life, for example I used the semiotic of pulling my sleeve down over my hand to show my character's distress. I also tried to use ^{semiotics} ~~postures~~ such as sitting when sad and reflective to standing tall and strong when my character becomes angry or hurt. By doing this, I also made my drama more dynamic as it wasn't all on one level, ~~but was constantly~~. I also tried to vary the tone of my voice, as I would when talking normally, to really try and bring my character to life and make my words sound natural rather than rehearsed.

If I was to do my work again, I would probably work more on the history between my character and her brother as well as the relationship between my character and her son. I would also like to use more costume - for example I would have liked to pin my hair back the way I imagined my character would and wear the kind of shoes that she would wear etc. Overall, I think that my ~~etc~~ monologue went OK I think I may have ruined it in places because I was so nervous but that, overall, I got my character and my situation across. If I was to put my monologue into my group drama I would like to do a split stage and perform it as, on the other half of the stage, the situation my character's son was in was mimed. e.g. he could be woken and be getting ready for an ambush as I worry about him. I think this would be powerful as it would portray two completely different sides to the war - each one separated from the other by just a thin gap ~~centro~~ stage. This could go at the beginning of our drama, after our scene of LB's speech and could lead into the ambush in the village. This would add yet another dimension to our group drama as it would display how things were for civilians in America as well as the American soldiers and the Vietnamese. I think this would give the audience a lot more to think about and would make our drama more relevant to our audience as they will each probably be able to relate to at least one of the characters in the drama, most probably the character from my monologue as most people have felt less at one point or another.

) * Moreover, I would like to work on my tone of voice to add depth to my words and work on my facial expressions so that I could show the audience my character's train of thought more clearly. Also, I think that I could be more still and less fidgety on stage to hold the audience's attention more effectively.

The work on your monologue showed sophistication of sensitivity - your writing records again of the highest standard. Well done!

Hey bro, (gentle)

I bet you're sick of the sight of me. It's just, I always seem to end up here lately. Perhaps it's because I know you'll always understand.

(said as though lost in memories)

(huge sigh) I have so many questions. Questions about the war. Questions about my son - about Chris. Everythings Chris.

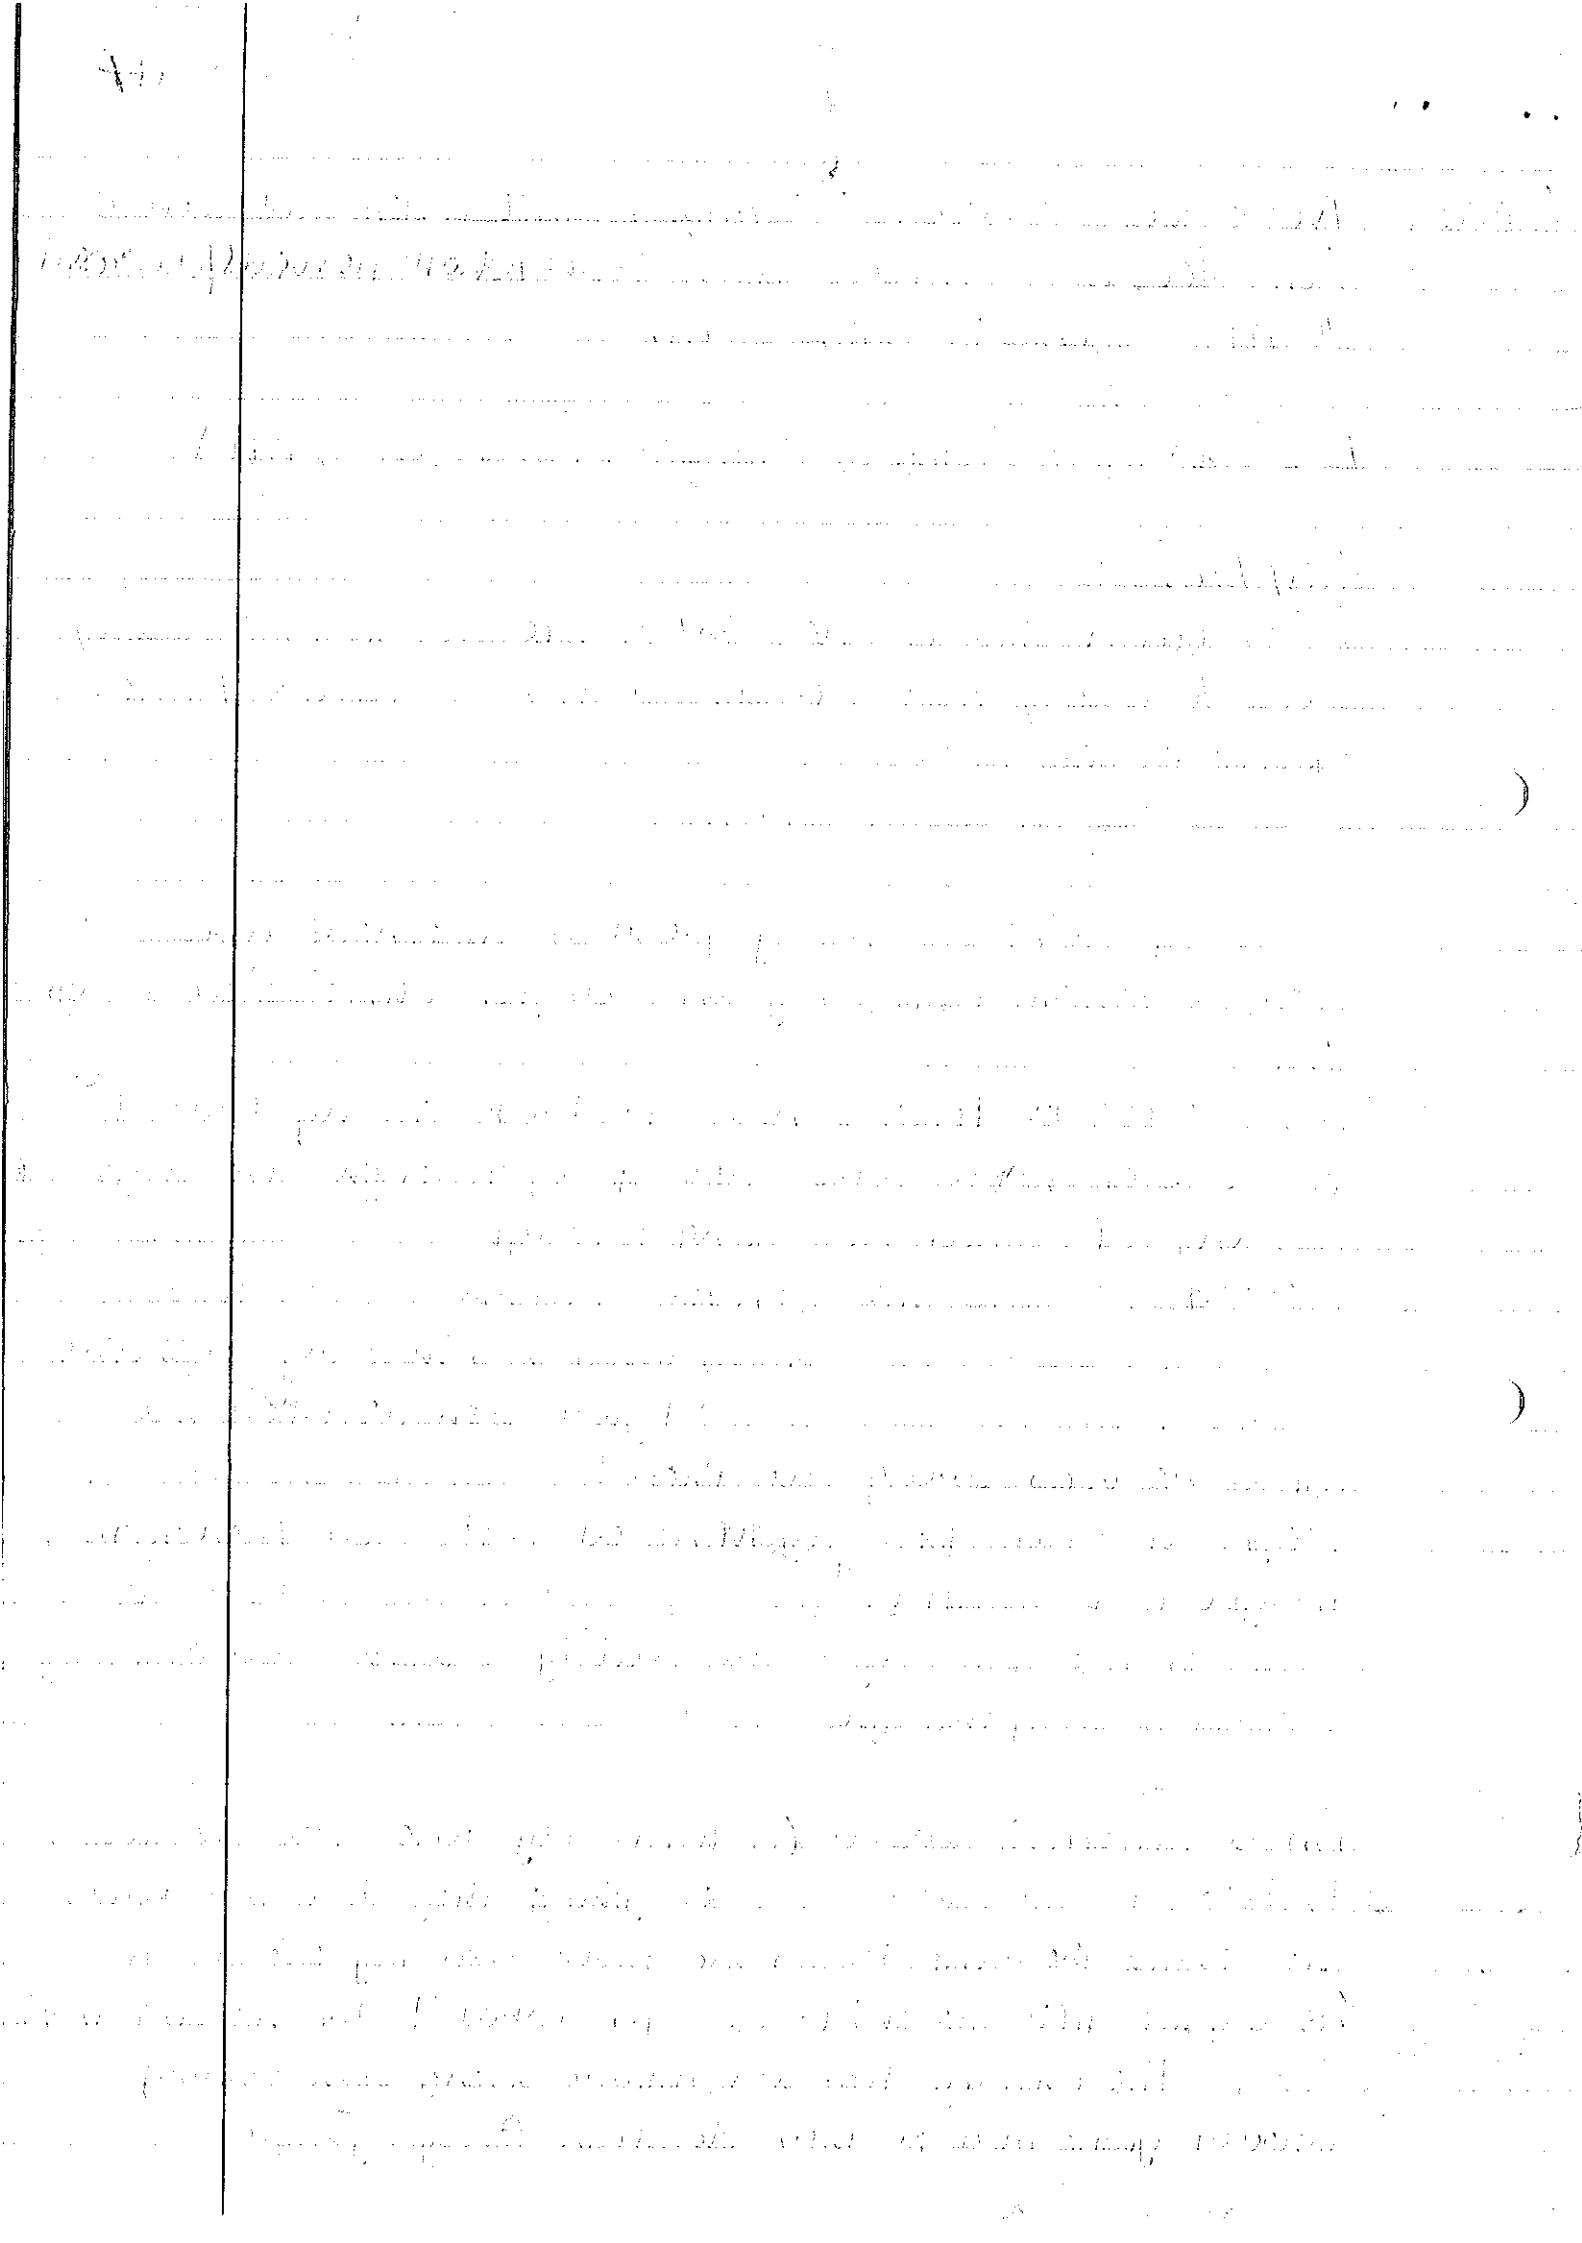

In his letters he tries so hard to look strong that I don't even know what he's going through. He says nothing of what he's going through (pull sleeve) (stand) Instead, he concentrates on me. My life (makes this sound completely ludicrous). What he's missing at home

(slightly hysterical laugh) I just wish he'd tell me what he was doing out there! (raises voice) [PAUSE]

Maybe it would put my mind at rest. But then again, maybe it wouldn't. (fight goes out of her and she starts - looks to the sky) Maybe the reality is worse than anything I could possibly imagine. (pulls knees close)

I'm so scared. So scared for him. My Chris. I see the news, I listen to the radio and everything they show just makes me think the worst. Makes me think that my ~~late~~ son is risking his life (harsh) for... for what?! For his COUNTRY! (laugh) this country that sees nothing wrong with sending innocent young men to their death in foreign jungles.

ITEM 3 - Evaluation

I really enjoyed our group drama and so decided to develop that further by doing a set design. I found the directors sketch challenging but also fun as it was different and something that I had never attempted before.

I think that my set design would develop our drama, firstly, by getting the audience's attention as soon as the scene started. I wanted the audience to be shocked at the abrupt change of scene between America (the first scene) and Vietnam, and to immediately start making assumptions about the scene to come.

Also, I wanted my set design to really display the homeliness of the set so that when the soldiers arrived it seemed very invasive. I also wanted the left side of the stage to be quite littered so that after the soldiers had had a clear path into the set, they could abuse and disregard the everyday objects of the Vietnamese to show their disregard for their lives and their culture. Also, I put the pigs in so that the soldiers could torment them - displaying their inhumane view of violence and torture, and also so that the pigs could make distressed noises throughout the scene - heightening emotion. I also developed our drama by creating a sort of cove in the flat of the house where the Vietnamese could hide out of sight of the soldiers but in view of the audience. I did this to create dramatic irony and increase tension on stage.

I also tried to use my set to make our plot more exciting and so I chose to have a fire gobo exciting ideas for set design that add to message of war shining onto the forest while the flat sinks into the floor (at the part when they set the village on fire) and also, I wanted to have the house cracking in half as half is lifted upwards and half is lowered into the stage. I thought this would be really exciting as it would show the world of the Vietnamese crashing down to nothing as the soldiers leave. I also thought that at this point the pigs could squeal louder and louder as well and a soundtrack of crackling could be played so that the audience can hear, as well as see the village burning. I think this work has been really fun as it has given me an insight to a different side of drama and has let me take a more creative approach to theatre. I really enjoyed having complete control of the visual staging and being able to adapt our drama to fit ^{the} our staging. It has also made me more aware of how, as an actor, you can move and manipulate your staging and really use it to your full advantage.

Great commentary on your set design material!

EVALUATION OF ENTIRE UNIT

Our stimuli were Kim's story, the poem by the dixiechicks and the film platoon. We also did a lot of background work on the war and were shown some images taken in Vietnam.

We looked at many different aspects of the war using these stimuli. For instance platoon showed us what it was like for the recruits/soldiers, the song showed us what it was like for loved ones back in America, and Kim's story gave us an insight into what it was like for Vietnamese civilians. Also, the pictures displayed various aspects. One displaying a personal protest by a buddhist monk setting himself on fire and another showing a Vietnamese civilian being forced to shoot another by American soldiers. Those stimuli were very powerful and really broadened our understanding of both the Vietnam war and war in general.

For the group work, we were allowed to choose our style and genre based on the stimuli. Our style was Theatre in Education and our genre was Brechtian as we thought that this would work best. For evaluation of Item 1 - group work, see page 1 of working record.

For evaluation of Item 2 - monologue, see Page 10-14 of working record.

For evaluation of Item 3 - Set design,

See page 15B of the working record + attachment.

I feel that this piece of work particularly helped me develop as a denser as I found it quite a challenge working with my group to dense our drama as there was no script to develop and so we had to dense from scratch, using only the pictures and information we had been provided. However, although it was a challenge, I think that we did really well and I found it very helpful in developing my skills both as a ^{director} denser and a performer, also.

I think the monologue (Item 2) was the part in which I developed most as an actress. Being on stage alone, I was much more aware of my sensibilities and found myself really enjoying creating a character in such detail that I knew she would tug her sleeve when nervous and fidget when she became angry. This really helped me with my skills of developing a character background and in turn, my skills of conveying my characters emotions to my audience.

I found Item 3 really exciting as it opened the door to another aspect of theatre. It felt liberating to be able to have complete control over the way the staging made my audience feel and I felt that it was a piece of work that, had I had more time, I could've developed even further.

I think that the Vietnam war worked extremely well as a stimulus. It was a very versatile and open topic and so I felt as if the drama both I and my group created was completely original and separate from everybody else's. Also, there are so many different characters in a war and so it was great to play around with these and experiment with all the possibilities. Also, although the Vietnam war was a while ago war itself is still very current and so I found our work relevant and important for our generation. Looking back, I would've probably hoped to mix up my characters a bit so that instead of playing a concerned mother in both my group work and my monologue, I would maybe choose a different character for one of these & contrasting one like a General for instance, so that I could develop myself as an actress in different roles.

In my next piece of work, I think I should work more on my characters interaction with others and my movement on stage as these are the things I need to feel, I need to do the most work on.

Excellent, sophisticated and detailed commentary - very well analysed + full of insight into the possibilities of future work + the stimulus generally of the original document. The original document was written in English and has been translated into Spanish. The translation is accurate and reflects the original document's content. The original document discusses the construction of a bridge over the Rio Grande de la Plata, which is located in the province of Entre Ríos, Argentina. The bridge is intended to connect two parts of the country and will be built using modern engineering techniques. The original document also mentions the need for a large amount of money to finance the project, and it is hoped that the government will provide the necessary funds. The original document concludes by stating that the bridge will be completed in the near future and will greatly benefit the local population.
