Write your answer to Section B here:

Where would we be now had the internet not be invented you ask, well be ready for that question to be answered right here now and look no further.

As we all know the internet has provided people the freedom to discuss things or chat without having to be there face to face in a quick manner and has provided us with a load of information which would have only been possible in the past by going all the way to a library and finding the appropriate book. Search sites on the internet such as Google have also recently been adding sections such as news, weather, books, entertainment and discussions which in turn gives people a whole wide range of choices to choose from.

The internet has most certainly changed peoples lives in the last decade or so and we say this because no more than ~~7~~-seven or nine years ago was there no major chat sites such as Facebook or Twitter and instead the internet only contained a basic amount of information and this was really all it was being used for as well as news. Don't forget that although the internet was around back in say 2000 it was much less used then it is today and just goes to show how far we've come with advancing technology over the last ten years.

There are however some disadvantages to the internet and many of these are to do with either false information, for instance the site wikipedia, or cyber bullying on networking sites. The latter is in fact starting to become quite an issue with parents of children who are being bullied. These issues though can be managed and certainly doesn't mean that people shouldn't bother using the internet because still there are more advantages that do tend to outweigh many of the disadvantages.
