How far did British society change, 1939–1975?

Opportunities for women

Background Information

In the 1950s most people had a traditional view of the role of women. They were expected to be only wives and mothers. In many aspects of life women did not have the same rights and opportunities as men. Did this change between the 1950s and 1975?

SCHOOL OF THE FUTURE OPENS IN KENT

This is one of the nation's newest comprehensive schools. Lucky pupils here will be able to leave or go on to university with no regrets about their schooldays.

The whole approach to learning here is completely modern. The most striking feature is the very modern equipment. Boys can perfect their engineering skills with the most up to date machinery. In the office skills class, no more scrabbling for typewriters – the girls have one each. Similarly, in dressmaking and needlework the girls have all they need.

This really is a school of tomorrow for the children of today.

From a government information film broadcast in 1958.

From 1964 to 1970 Labour has made Britain a far less civilised place to live. Labour attacked what they saw as 'out of date' laws. But at least people knew how to behave in the 1950s. Now we see shouting and swearing and violence in the streets. Now we have marriages which last only a few minutes, leaving women miserable and isolated, broken families and deprived children. We have the terrible toll of unborn children who have been killed by selfish, reckless young women running eagerly for abortions.

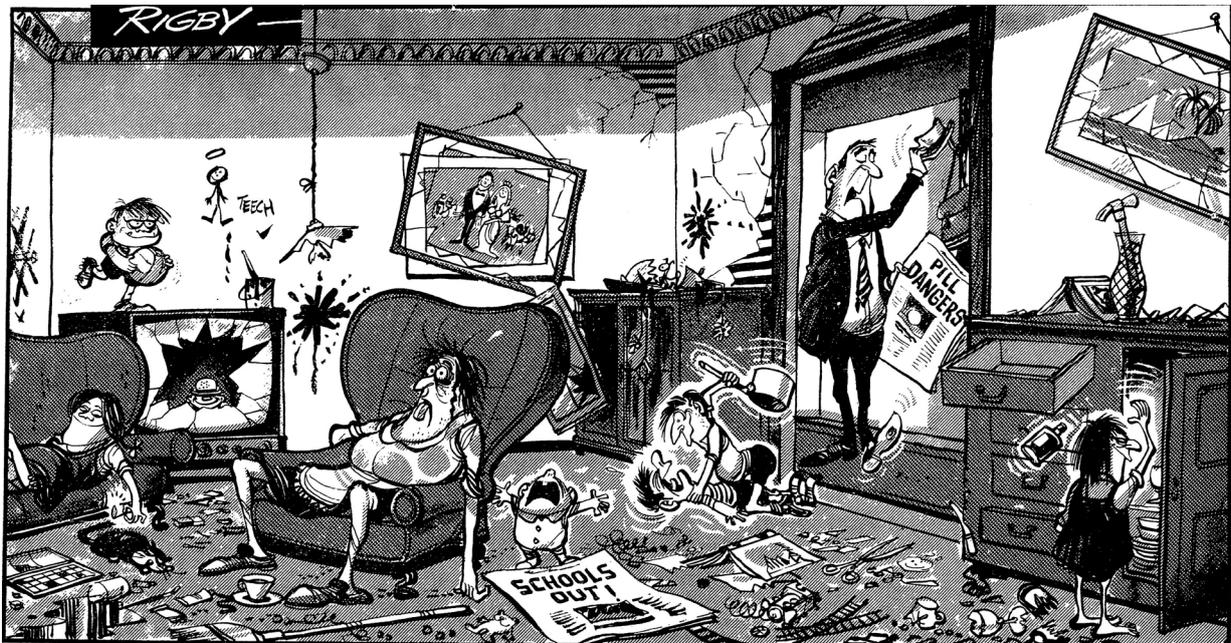

*From an article in the pro-Conservative newspaper, The Daily Telegraph, in 1970.
There was a General Election that year.*

Roy Jenkins and his colleagues made Britain a better place, especially for women. When Labour took power in 1964 the existing laws were clearly inadequate for the modern age. Many laws were viciously unfair to women. The Divorce Reform Act of 1969 was just one of the many great liberal and civilising reforms of the 1960s. This Act ended the emphasis on guilt and fault. The Matrimonial Property Act of 1970 recognised that a wife's work was an important contribution to a marriage. The laws represented a change in marriage from an unequal contract into a partnership based on affection and companionship.

From an obituary for the Labour MP Roy Jenkins who served in Labour governments in the 1960s and 1970s and died in 2003. An obituary is an article written about someone soon after their death.

Following the Equal Pay Act, I visited a wide range of workplaces to expose what was really going on. A typical example of what I found was this shoe factory. There were a lot of women putting heels on shoes. And there were a lot of men in another part of the factory putting heels on shoes. I said to the manager, 'I suppose you have equal pay?' And he said, 'Oh yes, we have equal pay.' So I asked him, 'Do you mean to say that the women here running this machine and the men over there running the same machine, get the same pay?' He said, 'Oh no, heavens no! Those men are putting heels on men's shoes. The women are putting heels on women's shoes. It's not the same work.' There were six nails going into each shoe and they were using the same machines. But the women didn't get the same pay.

I worked as a welder in the shipyard during the war and I loved it, but when the war ended I was forced out. When the new Sex Discrimination Act was passed in 1975 I went straight down to the shipyard and demanded a job. They might have been expecting some young Women's Libber to pull a stunt. They were not expecting a grey-haired 54-year old woman like me! I had been earning £27 per week in a shop but when I went into the shipyard my wage went up to £73. The older men tried to look after me, carry my tools and help with the hard work, but I knew I could manage the work. Even when I was tired I never admitted it. The younger men did not treat me any differently and I preferred that.

*From an interview with a woman in north-east England.
The interview was published in a local newspaper in 1980 when she retired.*
